What better way to hunt for lichen, nature's naturally beautiful moss covering, than in the nude? A class assignment in the study of plant life on trees and rocks led three students to volunteer for the field project. All three are nudists and their eagerness wasn't entirely due to the fact that they were "A" students. The chance to go to their secret place deep in the fern planted forest and advance their grades at the same time seemed almost too good to be true. Nudists, as we all know, need and prefer isolation. Our three male students wanted to get away from narrow minded society in order to enjoy the freedom and utter relaxation that nude walking and climbing can give. But here was a chance to investigate the deepest corners of their nudist retreat . . . down the narrowest pathways and under the thickest ferns . . . and learn something at the same time!

Three nudists hunt the elusive lichen in a beautiful forest retreat.

Armed with a spade, fork and rake they drove out, parked their car, disrobed and walked down the stone path to the wall that they were going to investigate first. Relieved that none of their other nudist friends had chosen this weekend to use the private sanctuary they began cautiously prying up rocks, looking for the colored lichen.
They soon found out that it wasn't going to be that easy. But the harder it got the more they enjoyed looking. The wonderful sense of physical well being that walking on tortuous paths and investigating hidden glades in the nude gave them, made them all the more anxious to find the scarce moss.

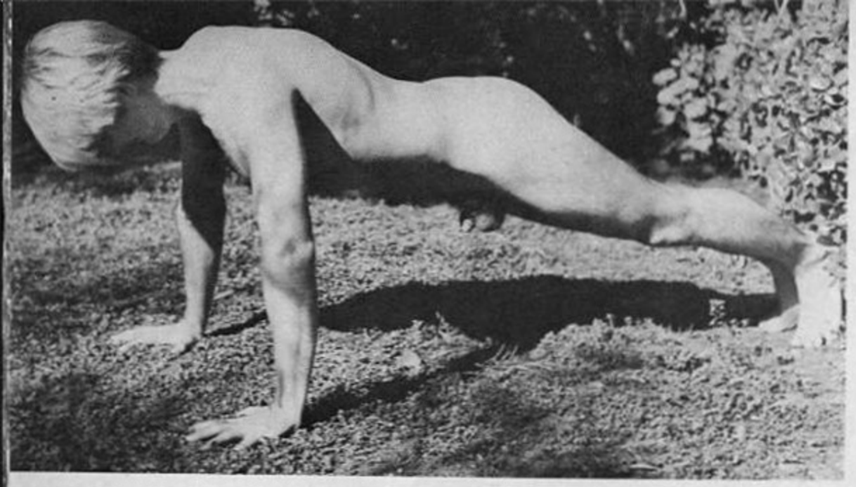
Soon they took to the trees, feeling like three Tarzans as they shinnied along branches and clambered up and down the trunks. And when, suddenly, they found themselves in the brilliant sunshine, they would simply stop their search and lie down, feeling the soft crush of leaves under their naked backs as they enjoyed a brief rest and sunbath.



But the lichen was very elusive. They pulled at tree bark, dug into the ground and turned over rocks. After awhile they became discouraged. Even some push-ups and sit-ups on the soft earth to loosen cramped muscles didn't seem to help. Then . . . suddenly one of them held up a rock and there, growing along its side, was the beautiful multi-colored lichen. They quickly found more, collected it and, after a playful victory pyramid near their rock wall starting point, headed back to clothes and civilization. Their class assignment was a success but, best of all, they knew that their private glade would be there waiting for them and their nudist friends the next time.

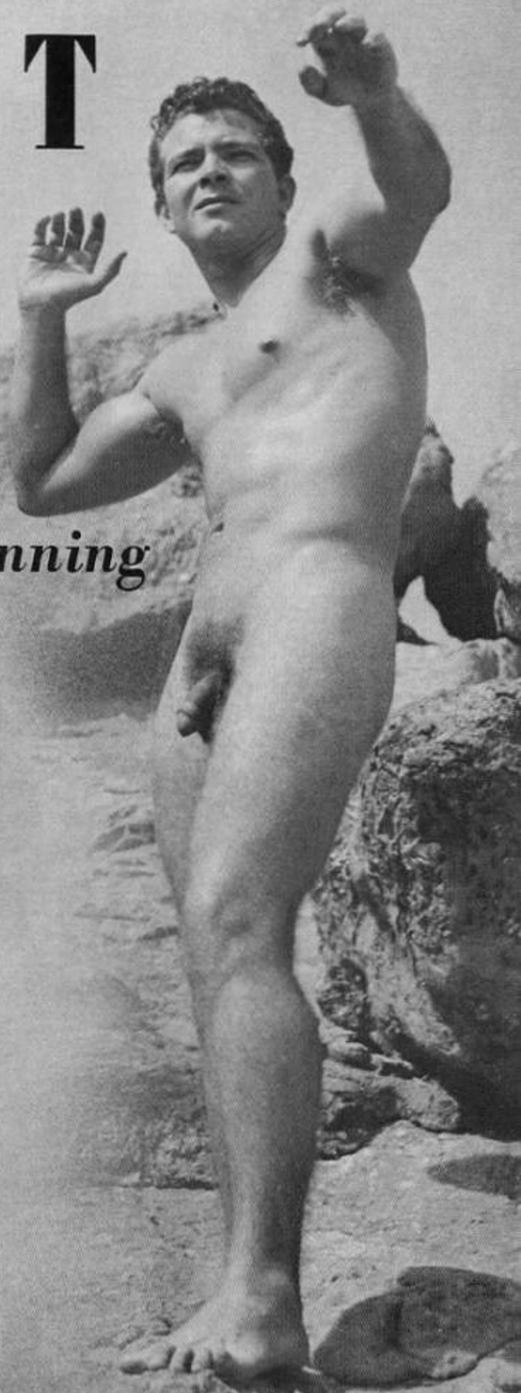
ANATOMY of a NUDIST

There's much, much more to the philosophy than building biceps or running naked through the woods



Some people still think of nudism as being nothing more than some strange, almost pagan form of body worship. These people think of nudists as a bunch of men who want to do nothing more than run around the hillside with nothing on and having no greater purpose in life than building up their biceps.

To a nudist, physical culture is only a part of nudism. While the body may be important, the nudist doesn't forget about his mind and emotions. If all a nudist wanted was a good build, there wouldn't be any nudist camps, only gyms. Nudism is more than just a physical thing – it is a philosophical way of being.

One of the reasons that so many men are becoming nudists is that they know there is a better way of life than that of the artificial world. Since we must live in cities of steel and glass, with smog-filled air and dusty streets, it is a great relief to get away from the city and spend some time in a genteel country place. Here one can relax and enjoy nature without the pressures and problems of the city.

Within the nudist philosophy, a man is freed from the symbols that our world has created. No longer wrapped in clothes that make him seem something that he is not, a man can relax and commune with nature.

This is more than body worship, this is a search for understanding of both self and others. Throughout the ages, great philosophers and wise men have left the cities and gone to seek understanding in nature. So it is with today's modern nudist. A good body is important, but the body is no use without the mind. Through nudism, the body can become stronger and at the same time improve the mind. The ability to cast away symbols and return to nature in the state he was created is more than many people will ever do. A man who is able to face his fellows as he was born and be without shame is not just interested in looking like a strong man . . . he is interested in becoming a more balanced human being.

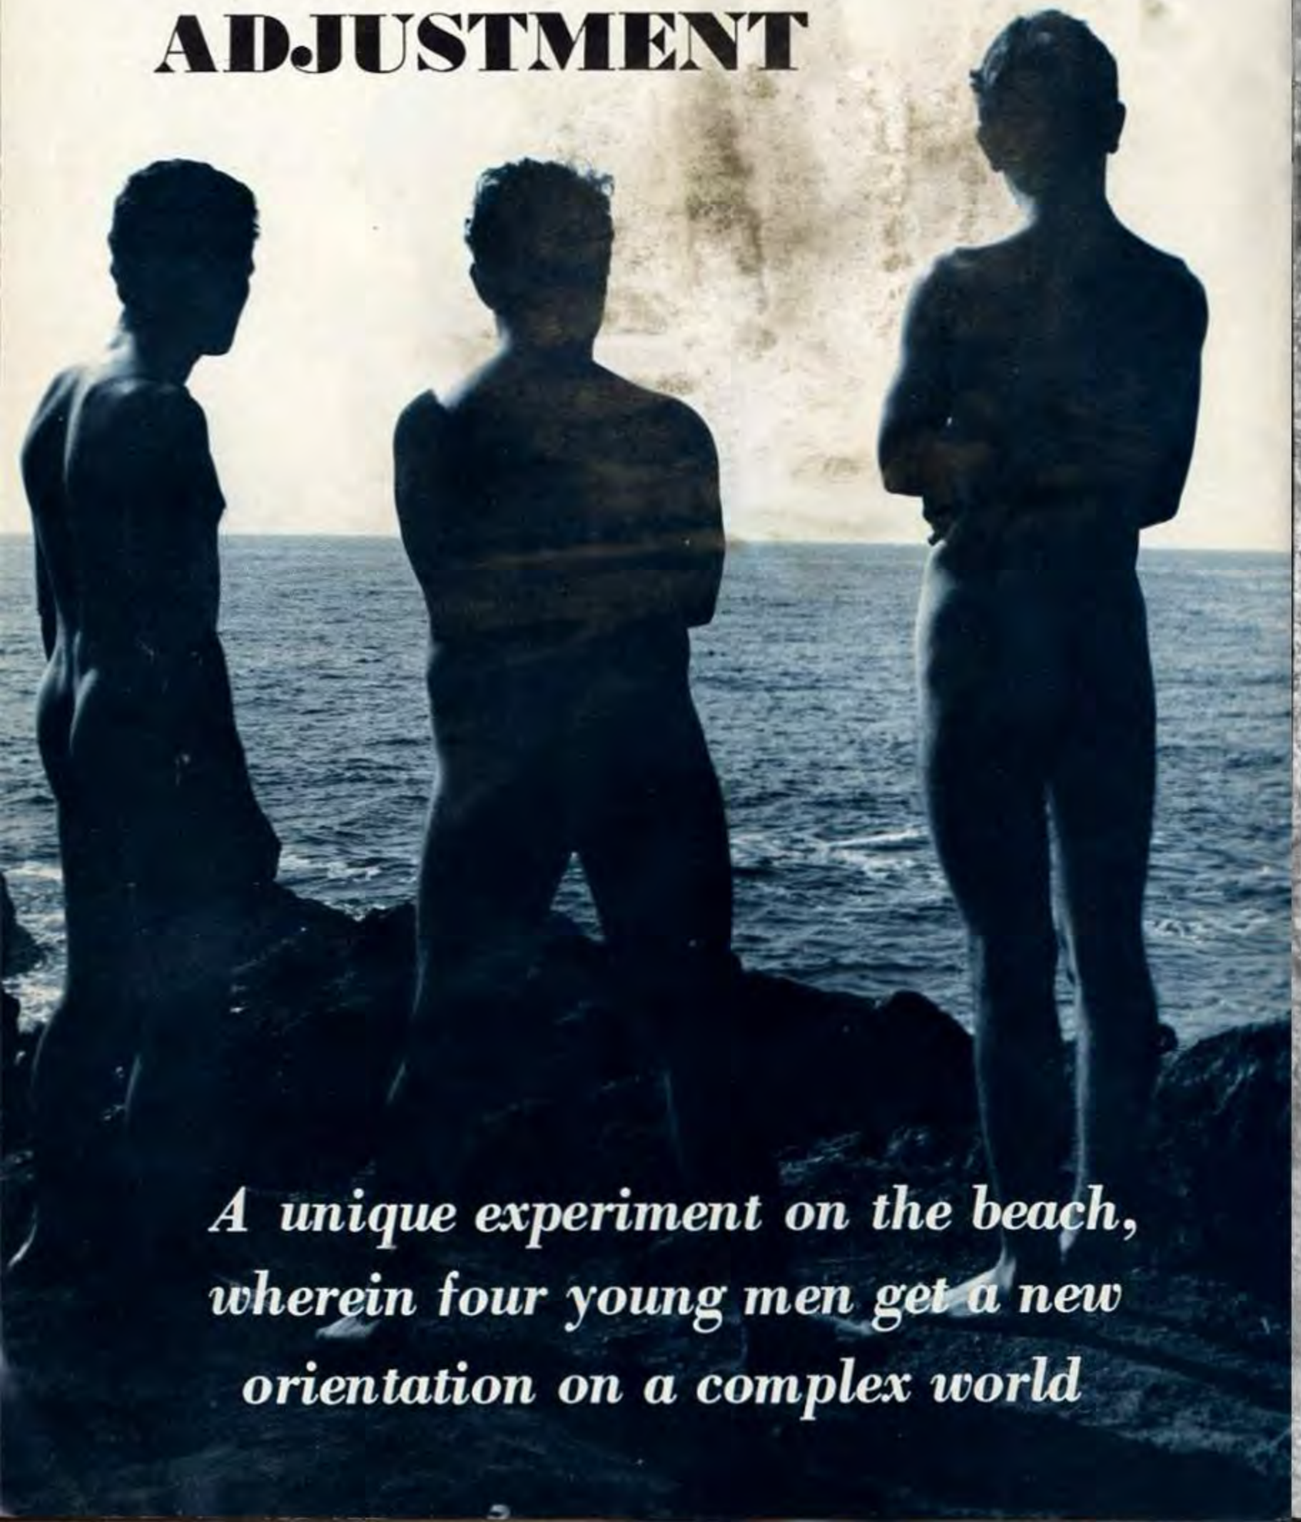
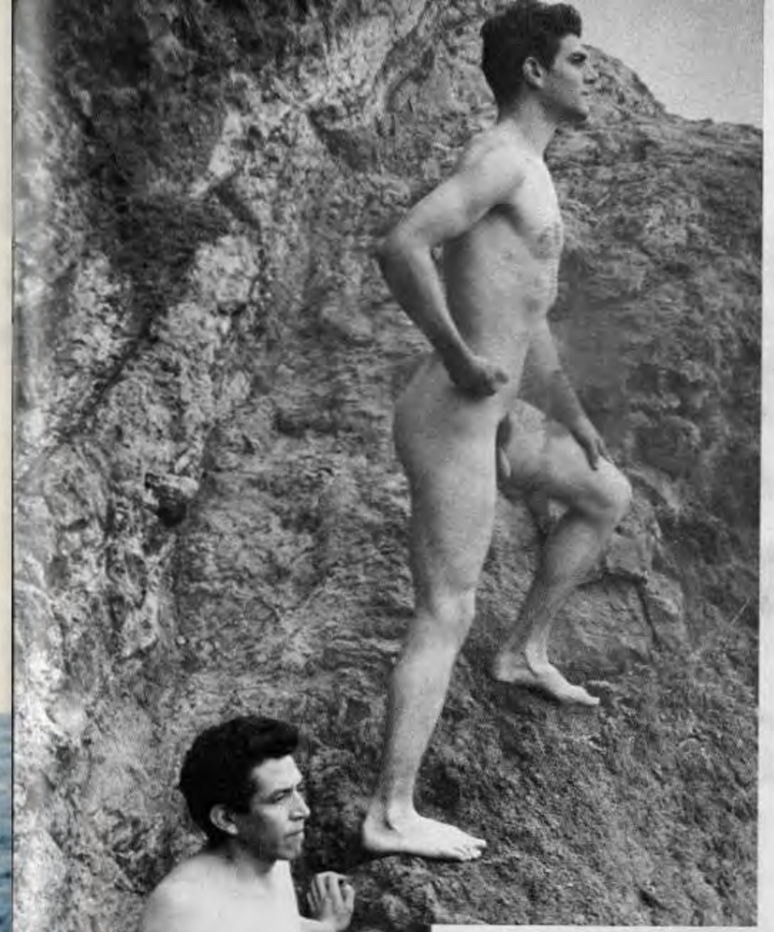
NUDISM AND SOCIAL ADJUSTMENT

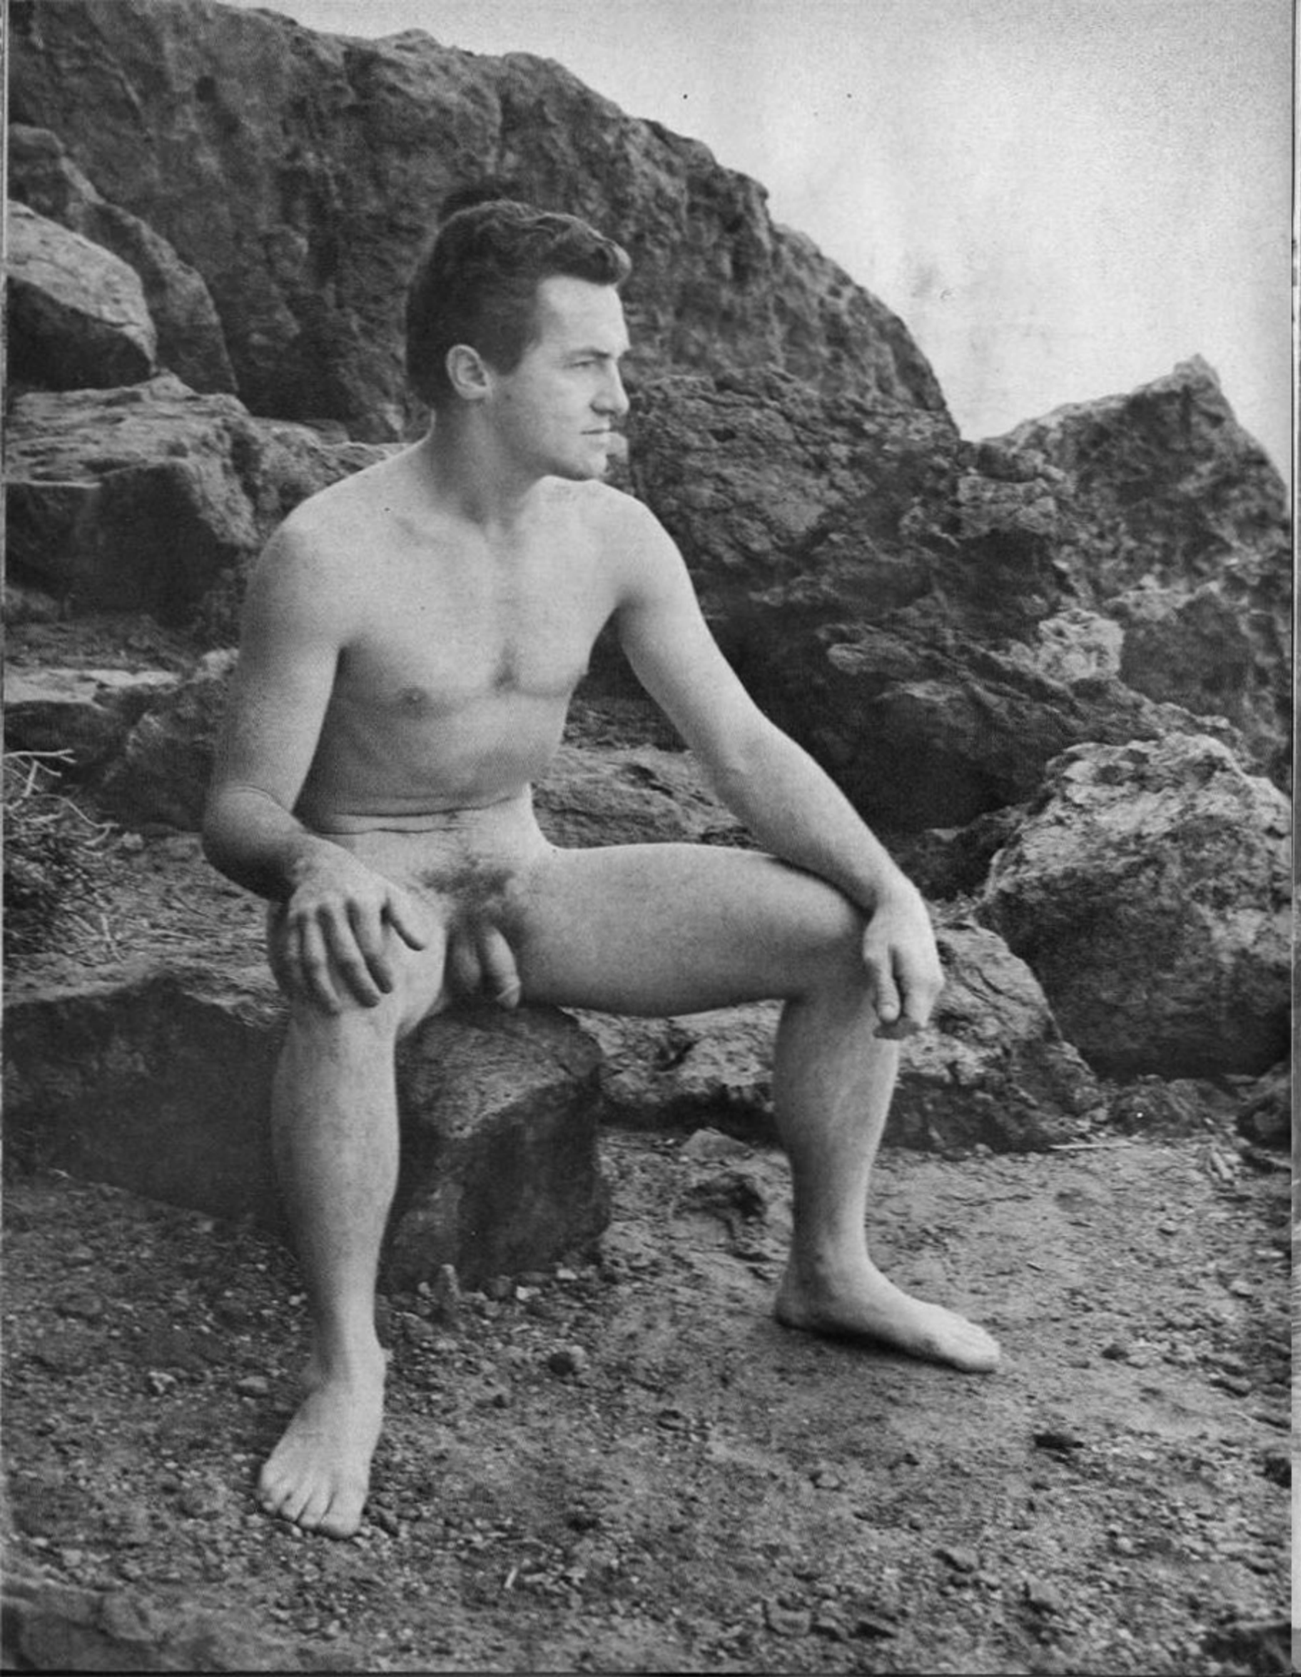


A unique experiment on the beach, wherein four young men get a new orientation on a complex world



The more complex the world becomes, the more complex become the problems of living in it. This is a concept of which we are all aware. It is a well known fact that when a man is not beset with problems and difficulties, he tends to be peaceful and relaxed. Only within the complex world do we find ulcers.

However, due to the technological advancements of the last fifty years, we find ourselves living in a highly complex culture — one which we really can't get away from. We would prefer to live with the problems of this world than go off in the hills and become hermits (which would, of course, only create a whole new set of problems).



But it is possible to do a few things which will help us live in and better understand the world of today. A recent experiment by a West Coast university professor shows us one way that we can better adjust to life.

The purpose of the experiment was to see what effect nudism and nature had upon dealing with the problems of today's world. For the unique test, four young men – whom we shall call Bill, George, Tom and Paul – were taken to a beach in Northern California. After a short and vague briefing, they were told to disrobe and relax.

Their first reaction was one of shock and disbelief, but all soon complied. The four men were about the same age and had attained the same educational level, but all four had shown some problems in getting along with (and in) the world.

Bill was concerned with status and social standing to the degree that he often worried about how far he would get in life. George felt that there were many people in the world who were against him, and that he always needed to be on guard. Tom felt that he could never really amount to much because there was so much that he didn't know.

Paul didn't feel that there was much meaning to being alive and didn't want to be faced with problems because life itself didn't matter.

During the first hour that they were at the beach, they were, to put it mildly, quite nervous. None of them had ever spent any time nude unless it was in the shower or while changing clothes. At first they were ashamed of their bodies and didn't know how to react to each other. However, after awhile, the effect of the sand and sun began to reach them. One by one they began to realize that there was nothing to be afraid of.

On the beach, their society-oriented problems gradually began to dissolve. Bill found that there was no reason for him to be worried about status because there was no way that status could be demonstrated or displayed in this environment. Soon he was stretched out on the sand, working on getting a good tan.

George at first was worried about what was going to happen. He felt, in his mind, that he had to be ready for anything that might occur – that he had to stay on guard. However, it soon became apparent that there was no need for him to feel this way. No one was going to steal anything from him, and no one was going to try to make a fool of him because everyone else there was in much the same situation as he.

Tom soon saw that there really wasn't that much difference between himself and the others and, after all, the sun felt so good on his body. His feelings of inadequacy soon dissolved under the warm rays of the sun, and he was able to just relax and enjoy being alive.

Paul, the arch-cynic, soon got over his earlier feelings of purposelessness. Faced with the magnificent beauty of the sea and surrounding scenery, he was quickly overwhelmed by the majesty of life and its deep meanings.

By the time the unique experiment was concluded, the four young men had become fast friends. The paper that the professor presented on the experiment didn't say that the quartet had solved their problems in adjustment through just the one nudist day at the beach. We rather doubt it.

But the good professor strongly implied that the day had set the men off in new directions, and had given them new insights on themselves and their fellow men. He did footnote the paper with this data: the four men have all become ardent nudists, and return as often as possible to that meaningful spot on the beach — a fragment of real estate that changed their lives.
